Question 1:

Read through this scenario, then, using what you have learned in this session, answer the following question.

Ross works at a child care program in his neighbourhood. He loves the work and enjoys connecting with the children in his care. He mostly works with 3 and 4 year olds. Lately, he has noticed that one of the boys in his class, Abraham, doesn't seem himself. Abraham used to love visiting with his friends and playing at the water table, but now he sits by himself in the corner and ignores the other children when they ask him to play.

When Ross first noticed this change in personality, he made sure to give Abraham some extra attention, to see if he could find out what was concerning the little boy, but Abraham refused to talk to him. Last week, Abraham had two toileting accidents, the first time he has wet himself since he was potty trained, and he seemed close to tears throughout the day. Today, Abraham came to the program with large bruises on his lower arm.

Ross has seen enough and goes to his supervisor to talk about the situation. To his surprise, she tells him not to jump to any conclusions. She knows Abraham's family and assures Ross they are good people. She also reminds him they have two other children in the program, who both seem fine. She tells him to do the best he can with Abraham, since there are only a few weeks left before summer break, and he will be going to Kindergarten next year.

What would you do in this situation?
